

1. INTRODUCTION

Cluster designs are commonly used because of cost efficiency. When in-person surveys are taken, for example, because a survey requires biological measurements, designs such as simple random sampling or stratified random sampling are often infeasible because they require widespread travel. Although cluster designs may have some other advantages such as allowing estimation of within-cluster homogeneity, the main reason they are employed is to lower data collection costs.